Mark Kelly has been working as an archaeologist for over 23 years. He brings his knowledge, expertise and experience to local communities around Ireland, encouraging them to explore their own local archaeological history in unique and practical ways. He believes, that by making archaeology tangible, accessible and fun for all, it can have positive and long-lasting effects. Mark's goal is not only to promote archaeology through education but to help future generations understand who they are, where they come from, and appreciate the multicultural society we live in today. Since 2011, Mark has been managing and running The School of Irish Archaeology, which specialises in educating people about Ireland's past through experiential workshops.
